Florida's real shark hunter: He's caught nearly 100,000 sharks and isn't stopping yet - meet the man hooked on man-eaters

By TINA CORWIN, DailyMail.com, and ALAN BURTT

As the sun sets in the Gulf of Mexico, a 75-foot boat heads out to sea. But this isn't just any old day of fishing. This is the day when Capt. Andrew Brookshire, a 52-year-old shark hunter, sets out to catch his 100,000th shark.

Brookshire has been shark hunting for over a decade and has captured nearly 100,000 sharks in that time. He's known as the real shark hunter and has become famous for his exploits on the high seas.

Brookshire's goal is to catch 10,000 sharks per year and he's been doing it for 12 years. He's used his passion for shark hunting to make a living and has even started his own shark hunting business.

Brookshire's success is due in part to his skilled fishing techniques and his ability to locate schools of sharks. He uses a combination of sonar and visual cues to find his targets and has developed a keen sense of where to find the most abundant schools.

Brookshire's approach to shark hunting is not just about catching sharks, but also about understanding their behavior and ecology. He's used his research to make a positive impact on the shark population and to promote the conservation of these important marine animals.

Brookshire's success has made him a hero to many shark lovers and conservationists who appreciate his efforts to protect and study these fascinating creatures. He's even been featured in a documentary film about his shark hunting adventures.

Despite his success, Brookshire remains humble and dedicated to his craft. He's a true shark hunter and his passion for the sea is evident in every aspect of his life. His goal is to continue shark hunting for as long as he can and to inspire others to appreciate and protect these magnificent creatures.